Five years later misfortune arrived at their doorstep, uninvited. About the Author

Freddy Linares was born in the Dominican Republic and lived there until the age of sixteen. In April of 1971 he moved to the Bronx, New York, to join his mother, Lucrecia, who migrated there six years before. Upon arriving to the Bronx he went to visit his first cousins in Manhattan and experienced a culture shock because he could not understand what was being said around him. The language became a barrier but not an impossible obstacle. He was raised by a single mother who, although illiterate, was a strong believer in the importance of getting a good education. That is the reason she brought him to this country. He knew that in order to be able to study he had to learn English. He undertook that task without the assistance of a teacher.

He is an avid reader and his passion is for ancient and classical history. He enjoys learning foreign languages and that is the reason why learning another language is the link to every other member of our human family.
